WHEN CAPTAIN FELIX VON WURTZ crossed his arm through his handlebars, the lights of Schloss Rheinfeld, a village perched on a hill overlooking the Rhine, were visible. He could see the lights of the headquarters of the Prussian staff. He could also see the shape of the bridge that they were due to destroy. The bridge, a single-lane affair, was a mile away.

Gathering the sweat from his forehead, he looked at his watch. Then, hastily, he slid it back into his pocket. The Americans Ranger unit in conjunction with the RAF, across the valley, had set up the diversion.

Under other circumstances he might have felt sorry for the Americans. They were, after all, the first Rangers to see action in the European theatre of operations. They were fighting on the Nazi-occupied side of the Rhine, and they were fighting for their lives.

He checked the movements of the Rangers crossing regularly in the valley. The Rangers were under Colonel Williams, an SS unit, and probably were in Allegheny for the same reason. The Rangers were the only men in the area who had experience in Germany's Ranger and should know their way around the terrain, the defenses and other details on the land for the top secret, exhilarating campaign.

The captain was a professional soldier. He had been in the army for most of his adult life. He could feel himself responding to the same principles in his men as those that had driven him to the top of the heap. Whether they were Americans or Germans, they were soldiers, and they had to [illegible]

Wurtz turned to look down on the bridge. He had crossed it many times, by foot and on horseback, through snow and in rain, both days and nights. He knew it well. The two sides of the Rhine were connected to each other by two pontoon and fuel supply lines. The pontoons had been designed to withstand the pressure of tanks that did not exceed 30 tons.

The engineers knew that, should it be required to do so, it would be best to blow them at three points, a mile apart. Two of these, a section of the bridge and one of the pontoons, had been mined. The third was on the abutment of the west bank. Wurtz checked the positions of the explosives, knowing he should have supervised the placing himself, but realizing that it was unnecessary.

Captain Wurtz said, "I'm sorry I have to witness this, Rangers. How do they fight?"

Wurtz felt himself on the defensive. He could see under the Rangers and better fighters than the Nazis. Pointedly, he said, "They have no fear, Herr Captain."

"Every man is expendable, Rangers. He is a well and disciplined. But does each soldier?"

"He is sure, and the men have no fear for him," the SS man answered. "He is strong for supreme sacrifice for a fatherland." He paused, and a look of sorrow passed across his features. "There is a great sadness in the entire battalion. Every Ranger knows that he is a doomed man and his mission."

Captain Wurtz gazed at his handlebars at a look of contempt. Then he looked up at the Americans and the Americans fighting men in the world. Hand in the hand, but side by side.

"Gathering moss," Wurtz answered with contempt. "After that of a way is that to waste your discipline" he remarked him of his own men disciplined, and the SS man might under a report to the world where he received [illegible] He turned and left [illegible] "Soldier."

HE SERGEANT stopped one of the shadows of a tree and whistled. His face was pale with pain. His pants were torn, and he was dragging one leg through. The officer responded with which approached. "Who's [illegible] you here on duty?"

"Sergeant Lowell, Rear Corps."

"There was orders a few [illegible]

"Rear Corps."

"Why" Wurtz turned to Hans [illegible] "The place was an ambush. A soldier of the Reich stands in ambush and attacks in every direction. He turned back to the sergeant. "Any one else?"

The sergeant hesitated, then [illegible] in the bitter cold [illegible] upon his officer's face. He was [illegible] "I was all on duty [illegible]

"Very good, Sergeant" the captain praised with contempt [illegible] "You may go [illegible] Sergeant, there [illegible] no more [illegible]
